In 1883, Gaetano (James) Donatelli left Italy for America in search of his 15-year-old runaway brother, Guisepppe (George). Arriving in New York with only four dollars in his pocket, Gaetano set off after Guisepppe and eventually found him in Pittsburgh.

The brothers found employment with the Canadian Pacific Railway in Winnipeg and worked their way to British Columbia. On the recommendation of an acquaintance, they moved to Silverhill, where Gaetano intended to try his hand at homesteading. In 1890, many Canadian men had left for the gold strike in California, making land in Western Canada a sweet deal. In those days, you could buy 64 hectares for five dollars. Gaetano bought 64 hectares on Wolfe Road and Guisepppe bought land at the corner of Manzer and Silverhill roads.

In 1892 Gaetano married Carminella Paduano and they had 11 children. Because there was no school in Silverhill until 1916, the children had to walk to school in Silverdale. To remedy this problem, Gaetano bought 64 hectares of land in Silverdale. Guisepppe then built a house across the field from his brother. Donatelli Avenue runs between where the two farms were located.

Gaetano had a bull and he charged neighbors two dollars a shot for “Peter’s” services. All of the Donatellis’ bulls were named

Peter.

Guisepppe was married twice but did not have any children. Widely known in the community, he was affectionately known as “Uncle George” by everyone. Later in life, he became “the district works foreman for municipality” - a position he held until his retirement.

Despite their rather isolated location, the Donatellis had some interesting experiences. Particularly memorable was Billy Miner’s famous train robbery. The Donatelli children were awakened when miner stopped the train in front of their home, and Carminella pushed them to the floor when shots rang out.

The Donatellis are remembered by many a hungry soul for their generosity. Hobos always found a meal at the homestead. “Pat the hobo” felt especially welcome at the Donatellis, where he eagerly awaited every Christmas.

To see a picturesque piece of the Donatelli history, drive west on the Lougheed highway and turn left on Donatelli Avenue. There you will find St. Anthony’s, a lovely little Catholic church built near the original homestead by the Donatellis and their friends.
